Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: . . . a flat spout about three inches long is soldered, and an ordinary lamp wick inserted and made to project inside and outside the spout. Water is poured into the bottom of the can until it reaches within an inch of the flat spout. Oil is then slowly poured in after previous mixing with about five per cent, by volume of larvacide, the latter thinning the oil. The amount of oil flowing from the can is regulated by compressing or prying open the spout until the drip gives the desired number of drops of oil per minute. In order to spread, the drops of heavy oil must strike the water surface with considerable force, hence it is best to elevate the drip so that the oil drops at least three feet before striking the surface of the water. On streams having an average width of one to two feet, from ten to twenty drops of oil per minute are applied. The quantity of oil required depends upon the spread of the oil, the alignment of the stream, roughness of banks, grade, alga present, obstructions, etc. For economic control a trial should be made at each ditch or stream where a drip is used to determine the requisite rate of flow. In many cases the drip need only be operated continuously for one or two days a week. On long streams or ditches it was sometimes necessary to use several drip cans, so placed that where the effect...
