John a McClernand, of Illinois, on the State of the Union: Delivered in the House of Representatives, January 14, 1861 Mr. Chairman: When an impending danger can be no longer stayed or averted, is it not the part of wisdom and duty to meet, and, if possible, overcome it? Such, I think, is a sound can on of statesmanship. Acting on this belief, I propose rather briefly to deal with the question of secession now actually upon us. First, I deny the constitutional right of any State to secede from the Union; second, I deprecate the exercise of any such assumed right as a measure of revolution, which, in the present case, must embroil the country in a sanguinary and wasting civil war. Starting with these postulates, I proceed with the effort to make them good. Our fathers, just emerged from colonial thralldom, and jealous of consolidated political power, when they come to frame the Articles of Confederation, adopted in 1778, run into the opposite extreme of dispersed and divided power. They formed an alliance, or at most a league, of sovereign Stales, under what might be called a treaty between independent Governments. In the language of one of the articles, they entered into a firm league of friendship with each other for the common defense; no more. Hence the Government, or Congress of the Confederation, was wholly destitute of any essential faculty of sovereignty. It had neither the right to prescribe a rule of action for its constituent body, nor the power to enforce one. It was without legislative, executive, or judicial authority. It could only advise, recommend, and entreat; and...
